Philanthropy Group Selects Today's Students Tomorrow's Teachers for its National Index of High-Impact Nonprofits

New S&I 100 index, comparable to the S&P 500, has the potential to transform charitable giving

NEW YORK, November 15, 2012 — Today, the Social Impact Exchange launched the Social Impact 100 (S&I 100) (www.SI100.org), the first-ever, broad index of U.S. nonprofits with proof of results and a high potential to reach more people than ever. Modeled on aspects of the S&P 500, the S&I 100 aggregates top-performing, evidence-based nonprofits so that funders – individual donors and foundations – can have confidence that they are contributing to organizations that consistently deliver impact.

Today's Students Tomorrow's Teachers is now a member of the S&I 100. TSTT was evaluated as a viable solution to the educational challenges facing diverse communities.

The S&I 100 tracks the number of people served across the portfolio of these top nonprofits the same way the S&P 500 tracks the profitability of America's large-cap companies. Donors are able to give directly to the nonprofits of their choice that are listed in the S&I 100.

“Right now, donors have no easy way of knowing which nonprofits are truly effective at helping people in need, which means that fewer charitable dollars are going to those programs that can do the most good,” said Alex Rossides, president of the Social Impact Exchange. “The S&I 100 changes that. By taking the guesswork out of giving, the S&I 100 has the potential to transform individual philanthropy the same way the S&P 500 changed investing for individual investors.”

The S&I 100 is the most comprehensive donation platform of exclusively evidence-based, growing nonprofits available to donors. Donors can choose from 100 high-impact nonprofits and nearly 16,000 local affiliates that are implementing their solutions. The Index features models that address the country's most pressing issues in the areas of education, health, youth and poverty. The 100 nonprofits are rigorously screened for evidence of impact through third-party verified studies - made available to donors on the website – and are only included in the Index if they have the ability to serve more people in need. When donors visit the site, they are able to search for high performing nonprofits in the issue areas and locations that they care about most. Once they select a nonprofit, the S&I 100 allows donors to give directly to the organization in a few quick and easy steps. The number of organizations on the S&I 100 will grow as the Social Impact Exchange continues to reach out and identify additional nonprofits that meet the S&I 100's criteria.

According to a Money for Good survey, nine out of 10 donors say nonprofit performance is important. Until now, funders have not had an easy way of knowing if their dollars are doing the most good. Among over 1.5 million nonprofit organizations in the country, there is a dearth of rigorous information donors can trust to tell them about the highest performers and their growing impact.

The S&I 100 was designed and implemented through a broad, sector-wide collaboration of evaluation firms, ratings firms and other leaders. Financial institutions, funder groups and other leading organizations are helping to share the Index with donors. The Social Impact Exchange will continue to collaborate with leading organizations and experts across the field to expand and improve the Index, and to help make the platform more accessible to donors. The aim is for donors to use the S&I 100 to make it easier for them to contribute to nonprofits that they are both passionate about and that have evidence of impact.

Major foundations, the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation, the William and Flora Hewlett Foundation, and others are supporting the Social Impact Exchange. The Social Impact Exchange is also working with donor advised funds, such as Schwab Charitable, to offer the S&I 100 to their philanthropic clients.
